Police Warnings and Cautions
under the Young Offenders Act 1997 – A summary

Please note: The Young Offenders Act 1997 is currently under review. IDRS has contacted the State Government’s Legislation, Policy and Criminal Law Review Division and has been informed that the reviewed act will not be passed by parliament until at least the end of 2014 or the beginning of 2015.

This summary is broken up into five headings:

1. Procedures available under the Young Offenders Act
2. Warnings
3. Cautions: Who is eligible?
4. Cautions: For what sorts of offences can they be given?
5. Cautions: What steps must police follow when giving them?

Attached to the end of this summary are relevant sections taken from the Young Offenders Act 1997 (NSW) (YOA), for your reference.

One of the objects of the YOA is to provide an alternative process to court proceedings for dealing with children who commit certain offences (set out in s8 of the Act, attached). That is, the YOA promotes the exercise of discretion by police to divert children away from the courts and the criminal justice system.
The YOA defines a ‘child’ as a person who is 10 years of age or older, and under 18 years of age (s4).

The YOA applies in relation to a person who:

a) Is or was a child when an offence covered by the YOA is or was committed or alleged to have been committed, and

b) Is under the age of 21 years when being dealt with under the Act (s7A(1)).

1. Procedures available under the Young Offenders Act

When a child comes into contact with police, police may have a discretion to give the child a ‘warning’. This is the least serious alternative available to them to deal with the matter. The other options are:

- a caution
- a youth justice conference
- laying charges

2. Warnings

Police will consider warning a child where:

- the alleged offence is a summary offence covered by the Act (other than a graffiti offence), or where the child fails, without reasonable excuse, fails to comply with a reasonable direction given to him/her by a police officer in a public place;\(^1\)
- the alleged offence does not involve violence, and
- they consider it is in the interests of justice for the matter to be dealt with by warning.

As a matter of practice, police are more likely to consider a warning where the child cooperates with them – the child does not need to admit the offence, but if the child is uncooperative or shows ‘attitude’ towards the police, a warning is less likely.

\(^1\) See sections 197 and 199 of the Law Enforcement (Powers and Responsibilities) Act 2002
Police can warn more than one person at a time – so, they could warn a group of young people. However, the more people involved, the less likely it is the police will give a warning. Usually groups suggest some level of planning or premeditation and render the conduct more serious.

Police can give warnings anywhere. It doesn’t need to be at a police station. They cannot put any conditions on a warning (eg. you can’t come back to this place for 30 days). They need to ensure the child understands the purpose, nature and effect of the warning.

A child who has no criminal history and has not been warned or cautioned in the past is more likely to get a warning; although a criminal record is not an automatic bar to being given a warning.

The sorts of offences for which warnings are commonly given include:

- Offensive conduct and language – eg. swearing in public
- Possessing small amounts of alcohol in public
- Trespassing

Police keep records of warnings given. They use those records only for their own future reference. Generally, the Commissioner of Police has to ensure that records of warnings are destroyed or expunged as soon as is reasonably practicable after the person to whom the record relates reaches the age of 21.

When you are assisting a child, you should consider what’s been alleged, the child’s criminal history and, if appropriate, raise the option of a warning with the police.
3. Cautions: Who is eligible?

Cautions, sometimes called ‘formal cautions’, are more serious than warnings and happen at police stations.

The police can only consider a caution where the person:

- is a child (defined in the YOA as a person who is 10 years of age or older, and under 18 years of age) at the time of the alleged incident;
- has committed an offence covered by the YOA, other than a graffiti offence (Note that under s31, a court may give a caution for a graffiti offence);
- admits the offence;
- consents to receiving a caution, and
- has not already had 3 cautions

Eligibility will also be determined by factors including the nature and seriousness of the offence(s) alleged, the degree of violence involved, the harm caused to any victim and the number and nature of any offences committed by the child.

4. Cautions: For what sorts of offences can they be given? (Part 4 of the YOA)

Ultimately, the police need to decide whether it is in the interests of justice to give a caution. However, they can only consider a caution for:

- summary offences (other than graffiti offences), or
- indictable offences that can be dealt with summarily.
There are some offences specifically excluded from coverage by the YOA. The main ones are:

- traffic offences committed by a child old enough to obtain a learner licence
- offences resulting in death
- offences under the Crimes (Domestic and Personal Violence) Act 2007 (NSW)
- most of the drug offences found in the Drug Misuse and Trafficking Act 1985 (NSW)
- some of the sex offences found in the Crimes Act 1900 (NSW)

In determining whether it is in the interests of justice to give a caution, police will take into account:

- the seriousness of the offence(s)
- the degree of violence (if any) involved
- the harm suffered by any victim
- the number and nature of any prior offences committed by the child
- the number of times offences have been dealt with under the YOA for the child

An investigating Police officer will make the initial decision about whether a caution should be given. If they decide that a caution is not in the interests of justice, they have to then refer the matter to a specialist youth officer (a specially appointed police officer) to determine whether the matter can be dealt with by way of youth justice conference.

If the police decide to progress the matter as a charge before the Children’s Court, there is still an option for the Magistrate to deal with the charge by way of caution.

The maximum number of cautions a person can get is three.

\[2\] For the more detailed list of exceptions – see section 8(2) YOA
5. Cautions: What steps must police follow when giving them? (Part 4 of the YOA)

If the investigating police officer decides to proceed by way of caution, then (s)he must explain to the child:

- the nature of the allegations
- that the child is entitled to legal advice and where to obtain it
- that the child is entitled to choose to take the matter to court
- the purpose, nature and effect of the caution.

If practicable, the police should give this explanation in front of the person responsible for the child, an adult nominated by the person responsible, an adult chosen by the child if the child is 14 or older, or a legal practitioner chosen by the child. Before a caution is given, the police need to give a written notice of the caution.

After the notice is given, the police generally have been 10 and 21 days to arrange to give the official caution. This is a cooling off period, where the child can get legal advice, choose to go to court, etc.

The official caution is given by a specially authorised police officer, specialist authorised youth officer, or respected member of the community such as an Aboriginal elder. When the caution is given, the child can be accompanied by:

- A parent, guardian or other person responsible for the child
- Another family member
- An adult chosen by the child
- A respected member of the child’s community chosen by the child, if the person arranging the caution thinks this is appropriate
- An interpreter
- A support person where the child has a communication or cognitive disability
- A social worker or health professional (where the child is under care)
• A supervising officer (where the child is on probation or subject to a community service order)
• The investigating police officer

The police must explain the caution to the child and give the child written notice after the caution has taken place. Police cannot attach any conditions to the caution, except that the child provides a written apology to any victim.

The caution is not a criminal record, but the police and courts keep a record of any caution on a ‘court alternatives history’ and these can be taken into account if the child comes before the police or Children’s Court in the future.

If a child fails to appear for the official caution, the police can institute criminal proceedings.

(5) A specialist youth officer to whom a matter is referred under subsection (4) may arrange for a caution to be given under this Part or take action under Part 5 and, in determining whether to do so, may take into account the fact that the victim has suffered substantial harm or the circumstances of the victim.

(2) An investigating official who arranges for a caution to be given may, at any time before the caution is given, determine that it is not in the interests of justice for the matter to be dealt with by way of a caution and refer the matter to a specialist youth officer for consideration of whether action should be taken under Part 5.

(3) The Director of Public Prosecutions may, at any time before a caution is given in respect of an offence referred by the Director under this Part, determine that it is not in the interests of justice for the matter to be dealt with by way of a caution and refer the matter to a conference administrator under Part 5 or commence proceedings.
